DEATH DOZE

THE NEW PATCHWORK DIDN'T CHANGE THE MAN

Johnny Wrigley still wore a uniform, but now the color was dark gray and the five inches of patchwork with the four battle stars and the purple heart were gone. In their places were the embroidered yellow words, "Great Oil Company."

Johnny had wanted the uniform to be a blue one with a silver badge, but a guy with a couple of artificial legs had to give up a lot of dreams.

A car pulled up to one of the pumps, its exhaust smoke heavy in the January cold. Johnny went outside. It was Mike Draper and another cop in a police squad car.

"Hi, Johnny," Mike said. "We're looking for Blacky Fall and three of his gang in a black sedan. They robbed the Clark Company's payroll and killed the paymaster."

"Nothing like that has come by," said Johnny.

Mike handed Johnny a cigar and drove off. Johnny, watching the squad car disappear slowly took a jack-knife from his pocket and clipped the cigar's end. Mike was lucky, he thought. Mike had come back whole. He could do things; he could be a cop!

At ten o'clock Johnny turned off the lights when a green limousine rolled into the drive. The driver opened the window next to him.

"Fill 'er up," the driver ordered.

As Johnny was turning away, he caught the gleam of a blue automatic in the hand of the guy next to the driver. He hesitated just a moment and the driver saw him do so.

"Get going," he snapped.

Johnny met the other's eyes. He asked, "Is your alcohol okay?"

"Yeah."

As Johnny walked toward the pump the driver raised his window, but Johnny heard him say as he did so, "What about him, Blacky?"

"Wait'll we get the gas," Blacky whispered.

Johnny fumbled at the gas pump. This was Blacky Fall in another stolen car! He took the top off the gas tank and inserted the pump nozzle. All the windows, Johnny observed, were closed now, except the small vents next to the rear seat. As he filled the tank he thought, "Those birds are going to get me!"

He took out his knife and began to cut the pump hose.

Johnny stalled as long as he could, but he heard the left rear door open and he walked around. A thug held a gun at Johnny.

"We figure you're too smart," he said. "Get in."

Johnny stepped slowly onto the running board and the guy with the gun gave him a push that sent him sprawling across the rear seat of the car. The thug inside the rear clipped him with the end of his gun. Johnny groaned and sank down into the corner of the rear seat.

"He's out, Blacky," the guy beside Johnny said.

"That's okay. He won't cause us any trouble." The big car hit the road.

Johnny was not out, but he let the others think he was. He felt the limousine turn off the highway.

Blacky said, "When we get out here a little farther, put a slug into that bird's head, Joe. Before he comes to."

"Okay," Joe answered. Johnny's heart skipped a beat, but he knew he was no match for four armed thugs with good limbs.

The car droned on for another half hour. Blacky yawned and so did Joe.

"Be glad when we—" Joe began. He didn't finish.

The car lurched suddenly, crashed a stone wall. The screech of steel against wood rent the crackling cold of the night as the big limousine struck a tree. Johnny hung to the upholstery as the car jounced to a stop in the ditch at the roadside.

Johnny was climbing out of the car as Mike Draper drove up.

"I'll be darned," said Mike. "You, Johnny! I been trailing this car since it turned off the highway. Suspected it might be Blacky."

"It is," Johnny replied. "With my compliments."

Mike gasped with astonishment. "What the deuce is that hose leading from the exhaust and stuck in the vent window?" he asked.

"The gas pump hose," Johnny said. "Carbon monoxide for Blacky and Company. I hugged the window and breathed air, but these guys just breathed poison till they went to sleep."

Mike poked his flash inside the car. "They've got a whole arsenal in there. I'd have looked like a Swiss cheese before they finished." He grinned at Johnny. "Thanks, kid. In spite of your bum legs you've done more than the entire county force could."

"I figured," Johnny choked, "If I couldn't be a cop myself the next best thing I could do would be to save a cop's life."

KILLER'S TRAP

THE CORPSE SPOKE WITHOUT A WORD

Lyle Hanley had worked for Captain Matt Curfew only a few days, but he knew already that there was a feud on in full swing between the captain and his nephew, Jacob Flint. Now from where he stood trimming the roses that climbed over the arbor in the rear of the house he could look through the picture window and into the living room.

The two men were facing one another and their words were hot with anger. Hanley listened as he clipped and shook his head.

"I warned you, Jacob," the captain stormed, "that if you married that woman you'd not get one cent of my money! I told you I'd leave every last penny for the care of Squall here!"

"No court would honor such a will!" returned Jacob Flint. "They'd say you were crazy as a bat, leaving all your money to a dog."

"Oh, they would!" replied the captain. "Let me tell you, Jacob, they wouldn't do that because I'll settle the whole thing afore I die. I'm eighty now and though I don't feel no more'n fifty, I know I'm not long for this world. I'll settle it tomorrow. I'll set up a fund for Squall. When he dies it'll go to the Seaman's Fund!"

Hanley saw the captain turn on his heel. He watched the exasperated Flint stand frozen to the spot. "I think you're crazy, anyway, Uncle Matt," he said, muffling his voice, "leaving all your money hidden about the house, refusing to trust banks—" The nephew stopped abruptly in the middle of the sentence, as Matt Curfew walked away, and threw up his hands. Then he turned, went outside and drove away.

Constable Ed North also ran the general store at Storm Haven. He was counting out the day's cash when the phone rang. Drawling, "Hello," into the phone was the last leisurely thing he did. From then on North became a dynamo of activity. He dumped the cash receipts into a canvas bag, locked the bag in the safe, turned off the lights. Then he got into his car and raced away in the direction of Captain Matt Curfew's house, stopping only long enough to pick up Harry Vance, his deputy.

At the captain's house Ed North got out of the car. "You drive over and pick up Jacob Flint, Harry," he said. "Meanwhile I'll look around here. If Flint gives you an argument use your gun. This here's murder or I'm a dog-eared cat."

Lyle Hanley stood on the sidewalk in front of the house and held a lighted flashlight in his hand. He approached North and said excitedly, "He's in the back, Constable. He's dead."

Captain Matt Curfew lay on the grass in the rear of the house, his head bashed in by a club that lay nearby. Squall, the mastiff, stood whining, tied to a tree.

"Let's have the story," North said to Hanley.

"Well," Hanley began, "I was asleep in the little house down in the back. Suddenly I heard the dog howling, yelping as if he was being beaten. I worked hard today and was sleeping heavy. By the time I got out in the yard Cap Curfew was running out of the house yelling, 'Leave Squall alone! Leave him be! Lucky I hear him yelp! You'd-a killed him!'"

Hanley continued, "That's as far as Cap got. The man beating Squall raised the club and brought it down on the old man's head, I ran toward them but the guy got away." Hanley waited, then added, "Cap Curfew sure loved that dog. Sure sorry it had to cause his death."

"Let's go down to jail," said North. "We'll go over this some more."

"Okay, I'd better get my coat," Hanley said. "You won't need a coat where you're going," North answered.

Hanley started. "What do you mean?" "You're not kidding anyone," North said. "And Harry will find the Captain's money hidden around your place somewhere, I'll bet."

North was watching the movements in the shadows and he sprang for Hanley's arm. He caught the hand in the darkness and a shot winged past his head. He let go a right that sent Hanley spinning and followed up with a left that sagged his knees. He grabbed the flashlight and shone it in Hanley's face, grabbed the gun from Hanley's hand. He clamped the cuffs on Hanley.

Harry Vance was just coming around the house with Flint.

"What's the meaning of this?" Flint asked. "Just that we have a murderer here who doesn't know his stuff," North said. "Hanley gave himself away when he said he heard the dog yelping. He didn't know Cap was deaf as a bat and studied lip-reading because he was too proud to let anybody know about it."

It's a FACT

If a fielder stops or catches a ball, with his cap, glove or other part of his uniform detached from its proper place, the runner or runners are entitled to three bases for a batted ball, two bases if the ball is thrown.

If a batter overslides second base and is put out, he is credited with a single. Similarly, if he slides beyond third, he gets a double.

In every game the home team must furnish the balls, each one packed in a box sealed with the league president's seal. Only the umpire, just prior to the game, may break the seal. He does this for two reasons, to inspect the ball and to remove its gloss.

If a play is being made on a runner, he is out if the third-base coach touches or physically assists him while he is leaving or returning to the base.

The first baseman's glove must not exceed twelve inches in length and eight inches in width. The lacing from the thumb to palm cannot be more than four inches long.

A player or coach ejected from a game must go around the field to the clubhouse; he cannot cross the field.

A relief pitcher gets only five warm-up balls.
